

Still unwieldy, male, pale and stale? Isomorphic influences on English university governing bodies, 13 April 2021

00:39:39 Simon Marginson: time to post your questions in the Chat colleagues - ask Alison about the 'more' behind her data

00:44:42 Simon Marginson: questions questions questions statements questions! (please)

00:47:57 Simon Marginson: still waiting on questions questions questions statements questions! (please)

00:49:06 Chris Ellison: How many of the universities you spoke to have actively sought to improve the diversity of their governing bodies?

00:50:15 John Anchor: You mentioned the role of alumni. Do you have any data on community or geographical origins of governors? The Polytechnics were of course rooted in their local education authorities.

00:50:50 Ian McNay: Alison, thank you. Peter has asked one of my questions. My other is about 'are they more effective?' What are the criteria for judgement. I go back to Dearing where it was recommended that GBs did a quinquennial review though ambiguous about whether of themselves or of the university and its relations with what Dearing labelled constituencies

00:50:51 Hongwei Gu: How does isomorphic influences on English university governing bodies alter deeply ingrained perceptions and behaviours?

00:56:57 Akiyoshi Yonezawa: Could I ask if there are distinctive characteristics in composition of governance bodies among universities with, for example, female vice chancellors? I am interested in the diversification of university leaders (from international perspectives).

01:01:39 Lauren Bolz: Very interesting point earlier about student representation. What do you see as the future/ideal form of student representation and student-staff partnerships in governing bodies and students' unions role in this?

01:07:17 Hongwei Gu: Thank you Alison!

01:08:14 Dinara Sultan: Thank you Alison! Very interesting study!
